

The cost of maintaining a life-insurance policy increases as you age—but your target premiums don't. At a younger age, your target premium is more than the charges to maintain your policy, so your account builds value. As you get older, when the charges exceed your target premium, the interest generated by your accumulated value can pay for the difference. However, interest is generated only as long as account value is maintained.